Craig, an experienced biker, had just bought a new motorbike which he took out for a first ride. Craig was not used to the motorbike's controls and power. As a result, he went round a corner too fast. The motorbike crossed onto a pavement and collided with Debbie, a pedestrian. Debbie suffered a broken leg, a condition that was made worse by an earlier sporting injury.

The factory's boundary fence ran through some trees. Children often climbed these trees to get over the fence and then run into the factory warehouse to steal biscuits. Ella found this very annoying. She knew that the door to the warehouse, through which the children ran, was loose and in danger of collapse. Ella had told her employees to use a different door. Ella had also put a sign on the door telling people to keep out. One day, Gemma, who was 12 years old, got over the fence and went to the warehouse to look for biscuits. As she was just entering the warehouse, the door collapsed and fell on her. Gemma suffered a broken arm and her mobile phone was badly damaged.

Kanish worked as a property valuer for Bluebricks, an estate agent. He was paid by Bluebricks only when sales resulted from valuations he had made, and he had to use his own car and equipment when conducting valuations. Bluebricks instructed Kanish on a daily basis regarding which properties he would be valuing.

One evening, Kanish was at a restaurant with his friend Les. Les mentioned that he was thinking of moving house and that he had made contact with Bluebricks. Kanish told Les that he had valued a house in the same street the previous day and that properties of that type were selling for around £300 000. Without checking, Les put his house up for sale for £300 000 and immediately received a full asking price offer which he accepted. Kanish then told Les that he had forgotten that Les's house had an extra bedroom compared with the houses that he had valued at £300 000. He said that Les's house should have been marketed for around £350 000.

Consider the rights and remedies of Les against Kanish and of Les against Bluebricks in relation to the sale of his house.

There are rules which restrict when a claimant can recover for pure economic loss in tort. Assess the reasons why restrictions on recovery for pure economic loss exist.
