Item C

Pupil subcultures in schools may be pro-school or anti-school. Pupil subcultures can be based on class, gender, ethnicity or other factors. They may be a way that pupils assert their identity or express their frustration. Sociologists are interested in understanding reasons for the formation of these subcultures and the functions they fulfil for their members.

One way of studying pupil subcultures is to use overt participant observation. This type of observation allows researchers to be honest with the group and also avoid taking part in any rule-breaking behaviour. However, participants might change their behaviour as they know they are being observed.
