Merton was interested in how different people had different opportunities to fulfil their ambitions. Merton called these 'success goals' by which he meant things like earning money, having a good job or having a comfortable lifestyle. Merton believed that these goals were shared by most of society, but not all people had the opportunity to achieve these success goals. Merton said that there were five ways in which individuals could respond to the success goals in society, which were conformity, ritualism, innovation, retreatism and rebellion.

Davis and Moore believed that social stratification was vital in any human society – they said it was a ‘universal necessity’. In order for the society to function effectively, all roles needed to be filled by those best able to do them. Those in the roles must be trained effectively, and they must perform their role conscientiously.
